SteelEye Recruits Harrington Starr for Third Edition of RunningForALTSO

14 April 2021 Greg Winterton Public Print Submitted by on 14 April 2021

London-based RegTech provider SteelEye is back for another instalment of the firm's 'RunningForALTSO' fundraising event. The initiative began in June 2020 as a way to support A Leg To Stand On, the U.S. and U.K. mobility charity that provides free orthopaedic care to children with limb disabilities in developing countries.

This time around, recruitment firm Harrington Starr is the opponent; SteelEye CEO Matt Smith recruited Harrington Starr Founder and CEO Toby Babb using quite a novel approach.

"I called him out in a video on LinkedIn," said Smith. "He couldn't really say no."

Babb is familiar with the RunningForALTSO challenge, at least from afar, as he has followed SteelEye's progress during the firm's previous two challenges with consulting firm Baringa Partners. He's less familiar with ALTSO, but says that getting involved didn't take too much arm-twisting.

"As soon as it came up, we were happy to get involved," he said. "To be fair, we've seen Matt and SteelEye do this twice before, so we knew a bit about it. We filled the spots pretty quickly, actually."

The U.K.'s 'work from home if you can' mandate during the country's lockdowns has seen Babb resurrect a prior interest in running and he's now up to a half-marathon for his training regimen. He says that the health-related aspects of the 'new normal' of the past few months will continue even as many workers head back to the office.

"Five years ago, the working week was stricter – you do your job and go home, it was quite dogmatic. But in the last few years we've made sure people have had more of a balance and in some ways Covid has accelerated that. As we go back to the office, it's more important than ever to have that balance; to be healthier but also to be able to incorporate more CSR initiatives into the working week. There is a lot of appetite for this kind of thing at our firm – it's great for building camaraderie and supporting a great cause at the same time," he said.

Smith feels the same way.

"RunningForALTSO helps us to do good and be healthy at the same time. It's a good thing for our employees to do and we'll absolutely continue to do this when lockdowns lift," he said.

Round three begins on Monday, April 26th, and will see both companies' field ten runners, each of which has to cover as much ground as possible during that week (Monday – Friday); both SteelEye and Harrington Starr will donate £1 to ALTSO for each kilometre covered by each member of their team. The aggregate number of miles covered by each team will determine the winner; not that either firm is counting.

"We joke with each other about this being a competition, but it's about raising money for ALTSO," said Smith. "£400 buys a wheelchair for a child. It's literally lifechanging and that's what it's actually about."

You can donate at https://www.altso.org/steeleyerun and follow the progress of both SteelEye and Harrington Starr on social media using the hashtag #RunningForALTSO

Content role Public

Click here to sign up for AlphaWeek's email newsletter to get these stories delivered to your inbox

© The Sortino Group Ltd

All Rights Reserved. No part of this publication may be reproduced, stored in a retrieval system or transmitted in any form or by any means, electronic, mechanical, photocopying, recording or scanning or otherwise, except under the terms of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988 or under the terms of a licence issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency or other Reprographic Rights Organisation, without the written permission of the publisher. For more information about reprints from AlphaWeek, click here.